Hotep Press & Urban Leadership Institute are pleased to announce the release of Daddy's Girl: Remembering Advice From My Father edited by David Miller, M.Ed. The book addresses the importance of fathers developing healthy emotional, spiritual and physical relationships with their daughters.

Although Black fathers are often depicted as deadbeat, unavailable and/or missing, Daddy's Girl provides memoirs from Black women across the country who share intimate advice and quotes they received from their fathers growing up. "Daddy's Girl shatters the myth that Black fathers are not connected to their children," states Jennifer Cowan, a single mother of three from Inglewood, California.

Daddy's Girl is an inspiring and motivating book designed to uplift the hearts and minds of fathers and daughters who often struggle to maintain healthy relationships. The words and reflections throughout the book are a shining example of the kinds of productive and emotionally enriching relationships that fathers can have with their daughters.

Daddy's Girl is one of a series of books dedicated to highlighting responsible fatherhood and the growing need for men to honor and respect the special relationship that fathers and daughters naturally enjoy.

Daddy's Girl was compiled and edited by David Miller, co-founder of Urban Leadership Institute (ULI) and Hotep Press. ULI is a social enterprise that focuses on improving the quality of life among youth and families.

The forward for Daddy's Girl was written by Jonetta Rose Barras, author of What Ever Happened to Daddy's Little Girl? The Impact of Fatherlessness on Black Women.
